September 1865. Brice Bruton lost his farm to the Confederate invasion of Pennsylvania, while he served the Union Army. He's angry with God and guilt-ridden, knowing his family had to flee their home before the Gettysburg Battle. Brice travels to Texas, to reunite with his wife and daughter before heading to Oregon, his lifeline of hope while a POW in Andersonville Prison. Lainie Colbert, spinster, lives with her father and brother on a cattle ranch outside of Waco, Texas. Lainie's been a foster aunt to Emily Bruton for two years and loves the child with her whole heart. When Brice Bruton arrives to take his daughter away, Lainie's desperate to keep the little girl. She prays God will intervene and allow Emily to remain at the ranch. Grief stricken to learn his wife died, while he served the Union Army, Brice knows he can't travel with a child on his own, so he accepts a job as cowhand at the Colbert spread. Amid ranch life, Lainie and Brice clash over how to raise Emily. Lainie fears that Brice will leave and take Emily to Oregon. What's worse, Lainie's falling in love with Brice and knows he'll never be attracted to her, a plain range woman. Lainie's love and devotion to Emily turns Brice's opposition to admiration and romantic love. Brice goes up the trail with the Colberts' herd, and decides he wants his own ranch and Lainie for his wife. Would Lainie accept him after all the arguments over Emily? He's afraid to ask.
